[1] My dear Sir

I take the opportunity of my father's writing to you, to address a few lines to you, and to inform you of my safe arrival in London. As I arrived at Ostende I found there was no steamboat going for three days from thence, I proceeded therefore to Calais where I arrived in the evening and got on board the same night, and by that means I reached London at twelve o'clock on Wednesday. I met my uncle here who is going to embark, in the middl[e] of next month. My father has given up his intention of sending me to Leyden, and I shall very probably y not go to any university, but commence my ^{law} studies immediately at the Temple; if I go to any university, I shall go to Edinburgh or Glasgow. You were so kind as to say that you would forward my books by the bookseller, which I should like very much. I cannot conclude my letter without expressing to you, the gratitude and affection which I owe to you for the many benefits you have conferred upon me, and the kindness you have always shown me. You would oblige me very much if you would write me a few lines, whenever it is convenient to you, and believe me always to remain your affectionate and dutiful pupil. J. H. Colebrooke.
